Practice, method of intervention and objectives of the approach In order to cope with the scarcity of mineral resources, developed countries have a resource rarely mentioned: the metals contained in the products in use. The concept of urban mining thus consists in seeing the cities of today as the mines of the future. The intrinsic qualities of metals make them particularly suitable for successive recycling. Unlike other materials such as paper, they recycle almost infinitely: it is estimated that 75% of the aluminum produced in the world since 1880 is still in use today. The multiplication of the life cycles of the same raw material decreases the pressure on the natural deposits (...) The potential of urban mining in developed countries is considerable. The objective on site is twofold: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Raise employees' awareness of sustainable development - Optimize the recovery and recycling process to its maximum We acquired a copper wire stripper.
